

Many states use a "one bite rule" that protects dog owners from injury liability the first time their dog injures someone so long as they had no reason to know the dog was dangerous. However, California is not one of these states. Instead, the state makes the dog owner strictly liable for dog bites, even the first one. If the dog bites someone in a public place or lawfully in a private place, the dog owner can be held liable.